NoFap And Cold Plunges Don't Matter If Your Math Is Wrong

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Oct 20, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/27h4Kr2SRII Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter cuts through popular self-help noise — NoFap, cold plunges, bed-making — arguing that none of it matters if you don't have the core business math right: customer lifetime value must exceed acquisition cost.

📑 Contents

- 🧮 The Only Formula That Matters
- 🛁 Dismissing the Self-Help Rituals

🧮 The Only Formula That Matters 0:00

- Carter's central claim: "Life is just math."
  - Social media influencers overcomplicate success with a long list of lifestyle rituals and productivity habits.
  - All of it is noise if you don't get the underlying numbers right.
- The core business equation he presents:
  - If lifetime value (LTV) of a customer > cost to acquire a customer (CAC), you have a profitable business.
  - To make more money: increase LTV and/or lower CAC — that's the entire lever.
  - Nothing outside this equation meaningfully determines whether a business succeeds or fails.

🛁 Dismissing the Self-Help Rituals 0:25

- The rituals he calls out by name: NoFap, making your bed, cold plunges, red-light therapy, affirmations, talking to yourself.
  - His verdict: "That's the equivalent of bro astrology."
  - He doesn't say these things are harmful — "there's nothing wrong with those things within themselves" — but insists they're irrelevant to actual outcomes if the math is off.
- Personal examples used to undercut the necessity of these habits:
  - Claims he hasn't made his bed in close to a decade (maybe once in ten years).
  - Did a cold plunge exactly once and decided it wasn't for him.

    - Flatly states everyone who claims to do NoFap is lying.
- Key takeaway framed as a conditional: do those rituals if you enjoy them, but don't mistake them for the reason you'll succeed.

> "If you just get the math right, it doesn't matter if you do that shit or not."