Executive Summary

Everyone is already consistent at something — even bad habits. The real challenge isn't building consistency; it's pointing that consistency toward the right actions.

The McDonald's Consistency Illustration 0:00

- Opens with a provocative example: a 350-pound man who goes to the McDonald's drive-thru every single day
 - The point is that this person is genuinely, undeniably consistent — just in a harmful habit
 - "I envy his consistency" — said to highlight that the discipline itself is admirable, even when misdirected
- The illustration reframes consistency as a neutral tool, not inherently virtuous

The Real Problem: Consistent at the Wrong Things 0:10

- The core message: you are probably already consistent in whatever you're doing right now
 - The reason you don't feel productive isn't a lack of consistency — it's that your consistency is aimed at the wrong thing
- The actionable implication: audit what you are currently consistent at, then redirect that same energy toward the right habits
 - Consistency is already present in most people; the missing piece is the target, not the discipline itself
