

Lust Equals Bad Decisions

Channel: Onem · Published: Jul 02, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/ExfFtO_bIO8 Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Removing women — and by extension ego — from the decision-making process forces men to think logically rather than for status or appearance, yielding better financial outcomes and genuine happiness.

Contents

-  Core Thesis: Women and Ego Drive Bad Decisions
-  The Car Example: Ferrari vs. Mercedes CLE
-  The City Example: Miami as a Status Trap
-  Practical Consequences of Status Purchases

Core Thesis: Women and Ego Drive Bad Decisions 0:01

- The central claim: removing women from your decision-making framework dramatically improves the quality of your choices
 - When women are factored out, you stop "thinking with your dick" and start asking "what is the logical outcome?"
 - For many men, removing women from the equation simultaneously removes ego — the two are tightly linked
- The result of ego-free thinking: decisions made "for the right reasons" rather than for appearance or social validation

The Car Example: Ferrari vs. Mercedes CLE 0:01

- Status-driven choice: buying a Ferrari to feel like "the man" while driving around
- Logical alternative: a 7-year-old Mercedes CLE convertible
 - Delivers approximately 80% of the same pleasure as the Ferrari
 - Top down, driving in the sun — the speaker argues you could actually be "way happier"
- The location multiplier argument:
 - Lamborghini in central London = decent level of happiness
 - Mercedes CLE in Marbella, off-season in winter at 20°C, with no crowds = "100 times happier and probably 20 times better off financially"
 - Reasoning: best cafes are uncrowded, you can sit on the beach, go to gyms, live a genuinely good life
 - The financial gap between the two scenarios is massive, while the happiness gap inverts entirely

"You will be 100 times happier and probably 20 times better off financially."

The City Example: Miami as a Status Trap 1:10

- Miami is presented as the archetypal status-driven lifestyle choice
 - Described as crowded, high-traffic, and "kind of trashy"
 - The speaker clarifies he likes Americans and considers America "probably the greatest country in the world" for its capability — but calls Miami culture "super cringe"
- The Miami promise sold to men: pull up in a Lambo, park outside a club, pop champagne, have everyone wondering if you're a celebrity or influencer
 - The speaker's reaction: "Could not care less. Do not want any of that."
- The implicit driver of the Miami fantasy is women and the desire for female attention — remove that motivation and the appeal of Miami evaporates entirely

Practical Consequences of Status Purchases 1:55

- Once ego is removed, practical flaws of status purchases become obvious — using the Ferrari as a case study:
 - No boot space — you can't carry anything useful
 - Can't pick up two friends
 - Not suitable for taking a family member (e.g., mom) to surgery — "you'd just get a taxi"
 - Can't pick up a partner from the airport because a suitcase won't fit
- The speaker's analogy: a Ferrari with no practicality is like "a beautiful woman that can't cook or clean" — purely surface level with no underlying function
 - "It's just pointless. It's just surface level. There's no reason for it."
- The conclusion loops back: an 80% happiness return is available from a convertible Mercedes CLE at a fraction of the cost and with full practicality intact