Why I'll Never Go to the Post Office

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 09, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/YO0dI6mBZ2Y Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter refuses to return purchases at the post office to avoid waiting in line, so he gives unwanted items to friends instead — a self-interested habit that unexpectedly improves his relationships.

📑 Contents

- 🏫 The Post Office Problem
- 🎁 The "Give It Away" Solution

🏫 The Post Office Problem 0:00

- Brandon has a firm personal rule: he will never go to the post office
  - His reasoning is that returning items requires waiting in line, which costs time and is unpleasant
  - He dismisses Amazon's return policy as irrelevant to him — the inconvenience of the process outweighs the refund
- He frames the post office line as a dealbreaker regardless of the item's value or the ease of the return

🎁 The "Give It Away" Solution 0:22

- Instead of returning items, he simply gives them to friends
  - His framing: "Now it's their problem" — he transfers the burden rather than dealing with it himself
  - Example: gave a watch he no longer wanted to his friend Ryan
    - His explicit motivation was avoiding the post office, not generosity

    > "Not cuz I'm a nice guy. I just didn't want to go to the post office."

- The unintended side effect: Ryan loved the watch and it strengthened their friendship
  - Brandon presents this as an accidental benefit, not the goal