People Say I Don't Enjoy Life. Here's My Answer.

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 09, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/heXQbXdx1Nk Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter reframes enjoyment: entertainment is not the only path to a fulfilling life. He finds deep, daily satisfaction in work, excellence, and creating value for others — arguing that entertainment-only enjoyment is actually selfish and limited.

📑 Contents

- 🔄 Reframing the Relationship with Pleasure and Pain
- 💼 Work as a Daily Source of Joy
- 🌍 The Selfishness of Entertainment-Only Enjoyment

🔄 Reframing the Relationship with Pleasure and Pain 0:00

- People accuse him of not enjoying life
  - His response: it's not that he doesn't enjoy life — he has changed his perspective on his relationship with struggle and pleasure
- Core claim: entertainment is not the only way to enjoy life
  - If entertainment is your only path to enjoyment, he says he pities you
    - Reason: you can only do entertaining things occasionally — you can't go on vacation every day

💼 Work as a Daily Source of Joy 0:23

- He can work 12 hours a day at his desk and derive at least as much joy from it as someone on a cruise or vacation
- Two specific forms of work-based enjoyment he identifies:
  - Pursuing excellence — seeing how much of his potential he can actually realize
  - Selling products and services that help customers achieve their goals
    - This also helps his employees feed their families and pay for their children's education

🌍 The Selfishness of Entertainment-Only Enjoyment 0:45

- He challenges the conventional framing of "enjoying life"
  - Points out that most people don't realize how selfish their version of enjoyment sounds
    - Their version of enjoyment only helps themselves — it's purely self-centered

- His counterpoint: every dollar he earns means he has helped someone else

  > "Every time I earn a dollar, it means I helped someone."

- Implication: value-creation through work is a more meaningful — and less selfish — form of enjoyment than pure entertainment