"Most of the Time" Isn't Consistency

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 10, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/FzkIklEt_54 Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter dismantles the idea that "most of the time" counts as consistency, using blunt everyday analogies to argue that real consistency means every single day — no exceptions.

📑 Contents

- 🔍 The False Consistency Trap
- 🐕 The Everyday Responsibility Analogy
- 💥 The Consequence of "Most of the Time"

🔍 The False Consistency Trap 0:00

- People claim they are consistent, but when pressed, they reveal they only do the thing "most of the time"
  - Carter's pattern: he asks someone how consistent they are, and the honest answer exposes the gap
  - "Most of the time" feels like consistency from the inside but is not consistency by any meaningful standard

🐕 The Everyday Responsibility Analogy 0:00

- Two vivid comparisons make the standard concrete:
  - Feeding your kids — you do it every single day; child services will remove your children if you only feed them "most of the time"
  - Walking your dog — you walk the dog every day, twice a day; skip it and you literally have waste all over your house
- The point: society already holds you to a true daily standard for responsibilities you care about — your goals deserve the same standard

💥 The Consequence of "Most of the Time" 0:24

- Settling for partial consistency produces a messy, chaotic life
  - Carter's metaphor: inconsistency leaves "shit and piss all over your life" — the same result as not walking your dog
- The takeaway is direct: if your results look like a mess, trace it back to fake consistency
  - True consistency is non-negotiable and daily, not occasional or "when it's convenient"