You Don't Walk Your Dog "Most Of The Time"

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 04, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/0IbZZsGBpmQ Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter argues that "most of the time" consistency is not real consistency. Using the dog-walking analogy, he shows that skipping non-negotiable daily habits — even once — produces compounding negative results in every area of life.

📑 Contents

- 🐕 The "Most Of The Time" Illusion
- 💩 Skipping Days Has Immediate Consequences
- 🚫 Mediocre Mantras to Eliminate

🐕 The "Most Of The Time" Illusion 0:00

- People commonly self-identify as "consistent" but when pressed, they reveal they only do the thing "most of the time"
  - This gap between perceived consistency and actual consistency is the core problem
- The dog-walking analogy: you don't walk your dog most of the time — you walk it every day, twice a day
  - If you don't, you get waste all over your house — an immediate, undeniable consequence
- The parenting analogy: you don't feed your kids most of the time — you feed them every single day
  - Failing to do so has serious real-world consequences (kids get taken away)
- The point: certain things are non-negotiable by their very nature, and your personal habits and goals deserve the same standard

💩 Skipping Days Has Immediate Consequences 0:23

- Doing things "most of the time" instead of "every time" produces what Carter calls a "shit and piss life" — messy, poor-quality results
  - The metaphor is direct: inconsistency = waste accumulating in your life just as it accumulates in your house when the dog isn't walked
- The dog-walk missed is not neutral — it doesn't just delay the outcome to tomorrow, it creates an immediate problem today
- "You get shitty results" is the direct cause-and-effect of inconsistent execution

🚫 Mediocre Mantras to Eliminate 0:46

- Phrases like "One day won't hurt" or "Just do it tomorrow" are labeled "mediocre mantras" — mindsets that normalize and excuse inconsistency
- These sayings feel harmless but they are the mental framework that produces mediocre outcomes
- The implied standard: eliminate these rationalizations entirely and treat your commitments the way you treat walking your dog — as a daily, non-negotiable act with real consequences if skipped