📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter used a Photoshopped vision board showing him holding two major awards he hadn't yet earned, kept it in daily view, and ultimately received both real awards — while cautioning that visualization alone isn't magic.

🖼️ The Photoshop Vision Board Experiment 0:00

- Approximately 10 years ago, Brandon asked his video editor, Johnny Thai, to create a vision board using Photoshop
  - The concept: Photoshop Brandon himself into an image where he is visibly holding two specific awards he had not yet earned
  - The image included his face, his name, and both awards in hand
- He printed the image out and placed it on his desk in New York where he worked every day
  - The goal was to see it constantly — every single day

🏆 The Two Target Awards 0:00

- Award 1: YouTube's Silver/Gold Play Button for reaching 1 million subscribers
- Award 2: ClickFunnels' award given when a single funnel generates $10 million in revenue
  - At the time of making the vision board, Brandon already held the $1 million ClickFunnels award
  - He was wondering when he would reach the $10 million milestone — so he had Johnny mock it up before it was real

📌 The Daily Reminder Method 0:22

- Printed the Photoshopped image and kept it physically on his work desk in New York
- The explicit purpose: to see it every day, all the time, keeping the goals front of mind

- He self-deprecatingly acknowledges the practice sounds like something "LA girls who wear hippie jewelry, collect rocks, and want to know your birth time" would do
  - Yet he did it anyway and credits it as meaningful

🤔 Reflection: What Visualization Does (and Doesn't) Do 0:46

- Outcome: He received both awards in real life
- He believes "there is something to" the act of visualizing and imagining goals

> "I don't think that you just think about something and the universe brings it to you — otherwise I'd be playing in the NBA."

- His view is nuanced: visualization isn't passive manifestation, but it does appear to have a meaningful effect when combined with action
  - The transcript cuts off before he fully elaborates on what he thinks the mechanism is
