🎭 The "President of the State" Frame 0:00

- Carter opens with a metaphor he calls "being president of the state"
  - The "state" refers to the emotional state of your audience or prospect
  - As the persuader/salesperson, your job is to be in full command of that state
- He lists the specific emotional controls a skilled communicator must have:
  - Make the audience happy on demand
  - Make them sad on demand
  - Make them cry on demand
- The framing positions emotional control not as manipulation to fear, but as a craft to master

🐕 The Live Emotional Manipulation Exercise 0:00

- Carter immediately puts the concept into practice on the viewer in real time
- The scenario he constructs:
  - You are sitting in your room, working
  - Your dog walks in — but slower than usual
  - Its head is slightly lowered
  - You sense something is wrong
  - The dog looks at you, then collapses and dies right in front of you
- After delivering the scenario, he immediately breaks the frame at [t=23s]:

    - "Okay, good. Scene over. Don't worry, guys — your dog is fine."
    - He admits he invented the scenario on the spot, seconds before saying it
    - He reassures: "Your dog is fine. It's eating your sandals and peeing on your wife right now."
- The point of the reveal: some viewers genuinely felt grief or distress even though nothing real happened

🧠 The Core Sales Psychology Principle 0:23

- The lesson Carter draws from the exercise is stated explicitly:

> "Whatever you think about, you will feel — whether it's real or not."

- Implications for sales and persuasion:
    - You do not need a real event to produce a real emotional response in a prospect
    - Language and imagery alone are sufficient to trigger genuine feelings
    - Skilled salespeople use this to create urgency, desire, fear of loss, or excitement — all through directed thinking
- The exercise itself is the proof: the fictional dying dog scenario required no visuals, no music, no special effects — only words guiding the imagination
