I Follow Up Until They Buy Or Die

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 11, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/b_gDPusHT2w Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter insists on following up with prospects indefinitely — until they buy, block him, or someone dies — arguing that this "pipeline reservoir" of unconverted leads eventually generates more revenue than new customers alone.

📑 Contents

- 🔁 The Follow-Up Philosophy: Buy, Block, or Die
- 💧 The Pipeline Reservoir: Turning Lost Leads into Long-Term Revenue

🔁 The Follow-Up Philosophy: Buy, Block, or Die 0:00

- Carter's core rule: if you can't close someone on the phone, the follow-up never stops
  - The only three exit conditions for stopping follow-up:
    - They block him
    - They buy from him
    - One of them dies
- When asked "how long do you keep following up?" — his answer: indefinitely, forever
- He has personally closed deals with prospects years after the initial conversation — literally years later

> "I want all the money. So if I have to follow up for years, that's what I'll do."

💧 The Pipeline Reservoir: Turning Lost Leads into Long-Term Revenue 0:22

- Every seller and entrepreneur he knows who masters follow-up notices the same pattern: they start earning more from follow-ups than from new clients
  - Reason: unconverted leads accumulate into a massive reservoir over time
- Concrete example he uses to illustrate the math:
  - 100 calls made per month
  - 25 deals closed (25% close rate)
  - 75 people per month go into the follow-up pipeline — not lost, just unseasoned
- Reframe: every unsold prospect is a seed, not a failure

    - "That's just a seed I'm going to start watering. I'll wait for it to grow and bear fruit."
- The practical mindset shift:
    - Don't view an incomplete sale as rejection
    - View it as the beginning of a nurturing process
    - Consistently water the seeds (follow up) and trust the compounding effect over time