i'll never be to cool to promote something i believe in

Channel: Greg Lav · Published: Nov 07, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/8XiSQ_gXOhM Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Greg Lav calls out a top red flag in new entrepreneurs: being too "cool" or reserved to aggressively promote their own brand. If you won't post daily or market boldly, stay home.

📑 Contents

- 🚩 Red Flag #1: Being Too Cool to Promote
- 💪 Greg's Personal Standard

🚩 Red Flag #1: Being Too Cool to Promote 0:00

- The number one red flag Greg sees in new entrepreneurs is a nonchalant attitude toward self-promotion
  - Entrepreneurs are "risking their life" to pursue this path — that level of commitment demands all-in marketing energy
  - Being too cool to post on your story, too cool to run pink trucks with your brand on them, is incompatible with entrepreneurial success
- Example behaviors flagged as unacceptable:
  - Not posting on your story
  - Refusing bold or attention-grabbing brand activations (e.g., branded trucks driving around)
  - Letting a product sit for a year without continuing to promote it daily

> "If you're nonchalant, if you're the coolest guy on earth and you don't want to post about your product that came out a year ago, then stay home, fam."

💪 Greg's Personal Standard 0:22

- Greg's own rule: post about his product every single day, no matter how long it has been out
  - He names a specific example — a "Chris Apple product" released a year ago — and says he will still promote it daily
- His closing declaration: "I'm not too cool for this"
  - Frames relentless promotion not as desperation, but as belief in what you're building
  - The willingness to look "uncool" is itself a marker of genuine entrepreneurial commitment