

You NEED 9to5 Jobs

Channel: Onem · Published: Jun 26, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/HjZeTiNqNSs> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Quitting your job without savings or income is reckless. A 9-5 is a no-payback loan, not a mark of failure — the real issue is an inability to manage money and blind trust in fraudulent online influencers.

Contents

-  The "Brokie" Myth and What a Job Actually Is
-  Why People Stay Broke Even With a Job
-  The Problem With Online Gurus and Their Advice
-  The Takeaway: What You Need to Do

The "Brokie" Myth and What a Job Actually Is 0:00

- A widespread belief — heavily influenced by figures like Andrew Tate — is that having a 9-5 job makes you a "brokie" or a failure
 - The creator flatly rejects this framing as false and harmful
- Reframe: a 9-5 job is a loan, not a trap
 - Analogy used: imagine going to a bank and asking for a loan, and they say "just show up here every day 9 to 5, we'll give you £50K, and you never have to pay it back"
 - "You'd think it was the greatest deal in human history"
 - Yet people treat jobs as a problem rather than a financial instrument
- The actual destructive pattern being called out:
 - People quit their jobs with no income lined up and no savings
 - They cite wanting to be a "digital nomad" or "start a business" as the reason
 - When pressed, they have neither income nor savings to fall back on

Why People Stay Broke Even With a Job 1:10

- The core problem with jobs, per the creator, is not the job itself — it's the employee's inability to manage the money
 - Monthly pay cycles are identified as a key psychological obstacle
 - Getting paid monthly makes it hard to accumulate money long enough to deploy it meaningfully
 - Hypothesis: "If you got paid in 1 year, you might be able to do something with it" — the lump sum would force better thinking

- Instead, people spend everything each month and end up with nothing
- The creator is blunt: the reason you're broke is a personal discipline failure, not the job structure
 - He cites his own work history as evidence he is not speaking from privilege:
 - Factory work
 - Finance work
 - Work on building sites
 - Characterises the current generation as "soft" and "lazy" by comparison

The Problem With Online Gurus and Their Advice 1:55

- The creator says he speaks daily to people who are broke and don't know what to do — and traces it back to bad creator advice
- His critique of the online guru/influencer space:
 - Most content creators are "full of shit" and lying to their audiences
 - Common fraudulent patterns he names:
 - Fitness influencers who are on steroids selling fitness courses
 - People whose wealth came from having a rich father
 - Implicit reference to Andrew Tate: "sold 15-year-old Romanian girls to billionaires"
 - Their wealth is not replicable — it was built through means their audience cannot copy
- The advice these creators give is characterised as short-term FOMO bait — designed to pressure viewers into buying a product, not to genuinely help them
 - "The advice that they're giving you is short-term to FOMO you into buying a product... It's fucking stupid"

The Takeaway: What You Need to Do 2:40

- The creator teases an upcoming product or resource aimed at solving these problems (described as "coming very soon")
- Three explicit calls to action directed at viewers:
 - Switch your brain on
 - Take accountability
 - Recognise that you are currently behaving like a "fucking idiot"
- Underlying message: stop letting influencers define your relationship with employment, keep your job, manage your money, and build from there