📋 Executive Summary

A brief, tongue-in-cheek linguistic argument that the word "airport" is illogical and that "plane station" better fits the definition, since airports — like bus and train stations — are comprised of terminals.

🔤 The Case Against "Airport" 0:00

- The word "airport" doesn't hold up to scrutiny when you look up the definition of "port"
  - The definition of "port" doesn't fit the context of where planes depart and arrive
  - By contrast, "bus station" and "train station" follow a clear, consistent naming pattern
- The word "station" is defined as a place comprised of terminals
  - Airports are literally comprised of terminals
  - This makes "airport" an inconsistent outlier in transportation naming conventions
- "Airport is a word that they just gave us and we all fell for it. We all followed it like sheep."

✈️ Why "Plane Station" Is the Right Term 0:23

- The proposed replacement: "plane station"
  - Follows the same logic as bus station and train station
  - Accurately reflects the terminal-based structure of the facility
- The call to action: stop saying "airport," start saying "plane station"
  - Framed as a matter of truth and independent thinking — "Don't be a sheep"
