Trainers, Stop Saying "Caloric Deficit"

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Oct 31, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/S9q1v809Tms Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Fitness trainers who use scientific jargon in their marketing only attract other trainers — not paying clients. Speak your target audience's language to convert viewers into customers.

📑 Contents

- 🚫 Don't Use Complex Jargon in Marketing
- 🗣️ Speak Your Client's Language
- ❌ What Not to Say

🚫 Don't Use Complex Jargon in Marketing 0:00

- Trainers often start mimicking scientific communicators (e.g., Jeff Nippard) after getting certified or watching educational fitness content
  - This is a marketing mistake — scientific language attracts other fitness-savvy people, not general consumers
  - Other trainers who watch your content will not buy your services
- Example of jargon to avoid:
  - "Fat loss is a two-step process: lipolysis and oxidation"
  - "Lipolysis is the breakdown of fat cells into fatty acids"
  - "Oxidation is the body using that fat as energy"
  - Brandon's point: technically accurate, but completely unnecessary for your target market

> The people who understand that language aren't the people who will buy your training.

🗣️ Speak Your Client's Language 1:23

- Regular people — your actual potential clients — do not talk in scientific terms
  - They say things like: "I need to go on a diet" or "I need to fix my eating habits"
  - They say: "Hey man, just get my body in shape"
- The advice: mirror the exact language your target audience uses naturally
  - This creates immediate connection and relatability
  - It signals that you understand their problem in their own words

- Brandon explicitly avoids the term "caloric deficit" in his own content for this reason
  - He also avoids trainer-speak and hard science vocabulary across all videos
  - His goal: attract everyday people who want results, not academics or fellow trainers

❌ What Not to Say 1:46

- Example of a video pitch that will fail:
  - "I'll show you how to stay in a caloric deficit to increase lipolysis"
  - Brandon's verdict: nobody from the general public will watch that video
- The core principle: combining jargon terms (caloric deficit + lipolysis) in one sentence is a double repellent to your real audience
- Actionable takeaway for trainers:
  - Audit your content and marketing copy for scientific or technical terms
  - Replace every instance with the plain, conversational phrasing your ideal client would actually use
  - Ask yourself: "Would someone who just wants to lose weight say this?" If no, rewrite it