What I Say When a Prospect Says "I Need to Talk to My Wife"

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 13, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/CBCuViwC81U Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter walks through a tactical, multi-step sales rebuttal for the classic "I need to talk to my wife" stall — using calm agreement, a commitment test, and a spend-threshold question to close without spousal interference.

📑 Contents

- 🧊 Step 1: Stay Cool and Buy Time
- 🔍 Step 2: Test Real Commitment with a Hypothetical
- 💰 Step 3: Find the Independent Spend Threshold
- 📦 Step 4: Fit the Offer Into That Number

🧊 Step 1: Stay Cool and Buy Time 0:00

- Do NOT push back immediately when the prospect raises the objection
  - Resistance at this moment kills the sale and the relationship
- Respond with calm agreement: "Yeah, it's no problem, man."
- Follow with a soft, curious question: "How long do you think you need to talk to her?"
  - This is non-threatening but subtly puts a timeline on the stall
  - Prospect typically answers: "I don't know, a day or two."
- Acknowledge that too: "No problem."
  - Keeps rapport intact and sets up the next move

🔍 Step 2: Test Real Commitment with a Hypothetical 0:07

- After acknowledging the stall, pivot with: "Just out of curiosity, what if your wife says no — what are you going to do?"
  - This one question reveals whether the objection is real or a polite exit
- Two possible responses and how to handle each:
  - Response A — "I'll just do it anyway"
    - Prospect signals he is the actual decision-maker

        - Immediate close: "Great. Well, let's just do it anyway."
    - Response B — "I'll just have to figure something else out" (the more common answer)
        - Signals genuine spousal veto power — move to Step 3

💰 Step 3: Find the Independent Spend Threshold 0:21

- Ask: "So what's an amount of money you know you can comfortably spend without having to get your wife involved?"
    - Prospect often deflects: "Oh, there's no limit, we just..."
- Push gently with humor to get a real number:
    - "Well, there's got to be some sort of amount — like you can buy a candy bar or a t-shirt without having to have a two-day conference with your wife, right?"
    - Prospect laughs and concedes the point
- Follow up: "So what do you think the max amount you can spend without having a big conference with her?"
    - Humor lowers defenses; laughter is a buying signal
    - Prospect now names a concrete dollar figure

📦 Step 4: Fit the Offer Into That Number 0:43

- Take whatever number the prospect gives and work backwards
    - Explore whether the offer can be structured as a payment plan or a down payment that falls at or under that threshold
- Goal: get a commitment the prospect can make unilaterally right now
- Core reasoning: "The last thing I want him to do is talk to this [wife] about my [offer]"
    - A third party who wasn't on the sales call, didn't feel the energy, and didn't hear the pitch is very likely to say no
    - Keeping the decision within the prospect's own authority dramatically increases close rate