

Seasons Of Life

Channel: Onem · Published: Sep 08, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/BI75Gr8Eb0M> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Filmed mid-hill sprint, the creator reflects on finishing a grueling year-long work season, explains why life must be navigated in rotating priority seasons, and reintroduces his "same five things on repeat for 5 years" framework.

Contents

-  Setting the Scene: A New Hill & A Finished Season
-  Burnout, Rest, and Knowing When You're Done
-  Fitness Season: Strongest Ever, But Lost Some Leanness
-  The "Same Five Things" Framework
-  Seasons Aren't Linear — Priority Rotates
-  The 1% Moments That Make It All Worth It

Setting the Scene: A New Hill & A Finished Season 0:00

- He's climbing a new hill for the first time, noting it looks "never ending" and "like twice as long as the old one"
- Uses the hill climb as a backdrop to reflect on a major life and business season that just wrapped up
- The video is a short-form, on-the-go vlog style — raw and unscripted

Burnout, Rest, and Knowing When You're Done 0:23

- The season he just completed was originally planned to be ~4 months of hard work
 - It ended up lasting around a year
- Across the entire year he took only 3–4 weeks off collectively
- Reached a clear internal signal: "I'm done. I'm done."
 - People around him were pushing him to keep going, asking "Do you want to push again?"
 - His answer: no — he chose to buy himself something nice and ease back
- Next phase for ONM (his brand/channel) will be easier because:
 - The hard work was done last year
 - He now has a system in place — "It's simple when you have a system"

Fitness Season: Strongest Ever, But Lost Some Leanness 0:44

- During the heavy business season, structured cardio/fitness training fell off
- Still maintained weight training throughout — lifting heavy consistently
 - Result: probably the strongest he's ever been in his life
- But noticed physical trade-offs from deprioritising conditioning:
 - Lost some cheekbone definition
 - Lost a little leanness
 - Some fat accumulated under the jaw
- His framing: this is just a season, not a failure
 - "It's boiling hot. Didn't really want to train. It's cooling down now."
 - Now in September, business foundations are laid — time to return to fitness
- Plans to sprint all the way up the hill once he's warmed up; acknowledges it's a long climb
- Also mentions he cut his head before filming — "absolutely pissing blood," called it "a nightmare"

The "Same Five Things" Framework 1:07

- His core life philosophy: same five things on repeat for 5 years
 - Not specified by name in this clip, but fitness and business are explicitly mentioned; relationships is the third example given
- The five things are not ranked in a fixed priority order
 - The ranking rotates depending on the season of life you're in
- Why five things specifically:
 - Having five defined areas means you always have time for everything — you can balance all of it
 - Chopping and changing plans without a framework causes chaos: "it goes everywhere"

Seasons Aren't Linear — Priority Rotates 1:29

- Core insight: "Life is not linear"
- At any given time, one of the five areas will be the current priority; the others are maintained but not the focus
- Examples of how priority shifts:
 - A 6–8 month period heavy on business
 - A 6-month period heavy on fitness
 - A 2-month period where the priority is a relationship
 - Example scenario: you've been neglecting a great partner, there's an anniversary and two birthdays coming up — you consciously push more effort into that relationship

- "She's a great woman. You know you want her to be your wife and the mother of your kids in the future."
- The framework prevents guilt or feeling like you're failing at one thing — you're just in a different season
- Closing declaration for this video: "Now we're in fitness season. Let's go."

"It's the same five things on repeat for 5 years — but not in a priority order. It's not always going to be fitness at the top of that list."

The 1% Moments That Make It All Worth It 2:18

- As he nears the top of the hill, he pauses on the view
- Reflection on why you grind through hard seasons:
 - "Life is like 99% shit and then in those 1% of good moments, you get a moment like this where you realize what you're doing all this for and it all comes together."
- The hill view is framed as a reward — the payoff for the year of work
- Ends the short trying to sprint to the summit before the video cuts off, with dogs chasing him