You need to stop avoiding your conflicts

Channel: Tim Luong · Published: Oct 15, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/mTNvweXZYyc Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Avoiding conflict is costly — in business and wealth-building, the faster you close the gap between noticing a problem and having the hard conversation, the better your outcomes.

📑 Contents

- 🌱 Personal Background: A Conflict-Avoidant Upbringing
- ⚠️ The Real Cost of Delayed Conversations
- ⚡ The Core Rule: Act the Same Day

🌱 Personal Background: A Conflict-Avoidant Upbringing 0:00

- Tim grew up in an Asian family where openly discussing feelings was not the norm
  - This upbringing shaped a conflict-avoidant personality that carried into his professional life
- When he started his first business, his biggest mistakes consistently traced back to conversations he delayed or never had

⚠️ The Real Cost of Delayed Conversations 0:22

- Example given: an underperforming employee or team member
  - The right move is to sit down with that person and clearly communicate:
    - Where they are falling short
    - What your expectations actually are
    - What clear, measurable success looks like
- If you avoid that conversation:
  - Their performance continues to decline
  - You quietly build resentment toward that person — not because of their performance alone, but because you never had the proper conversation
- The resentment compounds silently, making the situation worse over time

> The biggest professional mistakes often aren't strategic errors — they're conversations that should have happened earlier but didn't.

⚡ The Core Rule: Act the Same Day 0:44

- The overarching principle: minimize the time between recognizing a problem and addressing it
  - This is framed as a key skill for building wealth and professional success
- Practical guidance on timing:
  - Ideal: have the conversation the same day you feel the internal need to
  - Acceptable: wait until the next day if emotions are running too high in the moment
  - Never acceptable: indefinitely postponing a conversation that needs to happen
- The faster you develop the skill of speaking up in the moment you feel it internally, the better your results will be