When a Client Says You Charge Too Much

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 07, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/nTB9KExwqdI Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Hearing "you charge too much" means you failed to convey value — or your offer lacks it. The fix: make your product or service so clearly valuable that the current price feels like a great deal for the client.

📑 Contents

- 🚨 What "You Charge Too Much" Really Means
- 🔧 The Fix: Make Value Undeniable
- 🎯 Real Example: Managing Influencers on a Profit-Share Model

🚨 What "You Charge Too Much" Really Means 0:00

- If a prospective client asks "why do you charge so much?", it is a signal that something went wrong in the sales process
  - Specifically, one of two things happened:
    - You failed to communicate the value of what you are offering clearly enough
    - OR your offer genuinely does not have enough value to justify the price
- The objection is therefore not primarily a pricing problem — it is a value perception problem

🔧 The Fix: Make Value Undeniable 0:00

- The solution is to find a way to make your product or service so valuable that the client feels your current price is actually a bargain
  - The goal: the client should think "getting this at that price is a good deal for me"
- This requires rethinking what you include, how you present it, or how much risk you absorb on the client's behalf

🎯 Real Example: Managing Influencers on a Profit-Share Model 0:22

- Brandon gives an example from when he managed influencers directly
  - The situation: many influencers had large followings but did not know how to monetize or build their own products/websites
  - His pitch to them: "I will do everything for you — just keep creating content"

- What he took on (all risk and all operational work):
  - Building the website
  - Running advertisements
  - Setting up the payment gateway
  - Handling customer service
  - Investing his own money for ad spend (absorbing all financial risk)
  - Hiring staff for video/production support
- What the influencer contributed:
  - Simply continuing to make their regular videos
  - Providing access to their existing audience
- The arrangement:
  - After all that work, they split the profits
  - Brandon did all the work and took all the risk; the influencer brought the audience

    > "This was a win for both sides — and that's what makes it a very easy decision."
- The takeaway: when you structure an offer so that the other party gets clear upside with minimal effort or risk, price objections disappear — it becomes an obvious yes