📋 Executive Summary

If someone doubted you and you didn't reach your goal, they weren't hating — they were accurate. Use that truth and your resentment as a motivational weapon to outwork everyone who counted you out.

💡 Doubt Is an Accurate Assessment, Not Hatred 0:00

- If someone doubted you and you failed to reach your goal, they were not hating on you
  - Their doubt was, by definition, a correct evaluation of your ability at that time
  - "They were right" — not because they wished you ill, but because the outcome validated their skepticism
- The responsibility to prove them wrong or right belongs entirely to you
  - No one else controls whether the doubters are ultimately correct

📝 Build Your List of Doubters 0:05

- Concrete action step: make a physical list of every person who doubted or mocked you
  - Include people who laughed at you or made fun of your goals
  - Include personal betrayals — e.g., a girl/partner who cheated and left for someone else
    - Brandon acknowledges this pain directly: "I'm sorry about that. I didn't know you back then."
- Keep the list visible and look at it regularly
  - The purpose is to keep the memory of those moments emotionally alive and actionable

🔥 Use Resentment as Fuel to Outwork Your Enemies 0:22

- When you don't feel like doing what needs to be done, reframe the moment: if you don't put in the work, the doubters win
  - "You cannot let the doubters win."
  - The critics want you to skip the workout, skip the discipline, skip the hard thing

- Brandon's personal mental framework: he actively hopes his enemies are slacking
  - He hopes they are out getting intoxicated tonight
  - He hopes they are spending time in wasteful pursuits
  - He hopes they are on vacation — a long one
  - He hopes they are skipping their workouts and not tracking their macros
  - The logic: every moment they waste is a gap you can widen through consistent effort
- Final caveat: as you level up, the nature of your competition changes
  - "When you reach that level, your enemies will be highly qualified, strong opponents."
  - At the top, rivals are unlikely to be slacking — so the urgency to build your edge now, while they might still be complacent, is even greater
