Executive Summary

Brandon Carter explains that 75% consistency is the reason most people fail to get in shape — elite results require daily commitment, because stopping and restarting is harder than never quitting.

🧠 The 75% Problem: Why "Mostly Consistent" Fails 0:00

- A friend claimed he was "consistent" but couldn't get in shape
 - When pressed, he admitted he was consistent only about 75% of the time
 - Carter's response: that's exactly why you're not getting results
- Analogy: feeding your kids
 - You don't feed your children 75% of the time — they'd be taken away from you
 - You feed them every day, and as a result, they grow
 - Fitness requires the same non-negotiable daily standard

🚫 The "Treat Yourself" Trap 0:23

- The excuse that fills the missing 25% is "I just wanted to treat myself"
 - Carter reframes it: "You're not treating yourself — you're cheating yourself"
- Why skipping is more costly than it seems:
 - Every time you stop, you have to redo the hardest part: starting again
 - The cycle of stopping and restarting is harder than simply never stopping
- The key insight:

If you never stop and it just becomes the norm, then it becomes easy.

- Elite shape requires consistency even on vacations and while traveling — no exceptions

The Daily Habit Standard 0:46

- Second analogy: walking the dog / feeding pets
 - You don't take days off from caring for your pets — it's a daily, automatic responsibility
 - Treat your fitness with that same non-negotiable daily mindset
- The practical takeaway:
 - Remove the decision-making — fitness is not optional on any given day
 - When it becomes a norm rather than a choice, the effort required drops significantly
 - Result: elite-level physical results over time
