Executive Summary

Brandon Carter makes a comedic case that men should take pre-workout before sex, citing a study on caffeine and physical performance, and joking that skipping it means underperforming in the bedroom.

Contents

-  The Core Claim: Take Pre-Workout Before Sex
-  The "Evidence": Caffeine & Physical Performance
-  The Punchline

The Core Claim: Take Pre-Workout Before Sex 0:00

---

- Carter opens with a hyperbolic provocation: if you haven't taken pre-workout before sex, "you're basically a virgin"
  - Framed as comedic shock value to grab attention
- The argument: pre-workout enhances physical performance, and sex is a physical activity — therefore the two should be combined

The "Evidence": Caffeine & Physical Performance 0:10

- Carter references an unspecified study showing caffeine improves physical performance
  - No study name, journal, or specific metrics are cited — it is presented casually as supporting proof
- The logical leap: if caffeine helps you perform physically in workouts, it should help you perform during sex
- Carter's framing: not taking pre-workout before sex means "you ain't been giving your girl the best you can do" and have been "halfassing it"

The Punchline 0:22

- The clip ends mid-sentence on an implied joke: "That's why she been cheating on [you]"
  - Classic comedic callback structure — the underperformance caused by skipping pre-workout is blamed for relationship infidelity
- The video is clearly comedic/satirical in tone throughout, not a serious health or fitness recommendation
