

As a Father, it's your duty to set the example in all aspects

Executive Summary

Brandon Carter argues that fathers owe it to their sons to be exemplary in every dimension — fitness, work ethic, and finances — so the child's primary role model is his own dad, not someone else.

The Wake-Up Call From a Friend 0:00

- A friend came to Brandon complaining that his son wasn't listening to him
 - Brandon's (implied) response: look at yourself first
 - The friend was called out for being "fat" and "broke" — two areas where he had failed to set an example
- The anecdote frames the core message: you cannot demand respect or obedience from your child if you aren't modeling the behavior you expect

Be the Role Model in Every Aspect 0:05

- A father should be someone his son can look up to in all aspects — not just one or two
 - Specifically named: work ethic and physical fitness (physique)
 - The framing used: "That's the superhero" — dad should be the child's real-life superhero
- The danger of falling short: the child will find a role model elsewhere
 - Whoever fills that gap becomes more influential than the father
 - Brandon frames this as a serious, consequential loss of influence

"You should be the [role model]. And the problem with that is that person becomes more influential than you."

The Birthday Party Test 0:22

- Brandon, a father himself, has a five-year-old son
- He uses kids' birthday parties as a real-world illustration of fitness differences among dads
 - The "fat dads" at these parties can't keep up physically — they get tired and disengage
 - Brandon, by contrast, is jumping on trampolines and throwing kids in the air
 - All the children gravitate toward him — "they all climbing on me"
 - He notes no other dads at these events can do the same
- The implicit takeaway: being physically capable directly translates into presence, engagement, and influence with children — yours and others'
