

Lifestyle Inflation Good or Bad

Channel: Onem · Published: Jun 27, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/bYxaj14QSQ8> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Upgrading your lifestyle is necessary and healthy when it solves real problems or improves quality of life — but if the motivation is status, attention, or impressing women, it signals ego issues and leads to financial ruin.

Contents

-  When Lifestyle Upgrades Are Justified
-  The "Thinking With Your Dick" Test
-  Why Supercars Are Actually a Negative
-  The Core Question to Ask Yourself
-  The Long-Term Cost of Status Spending

When Lifestyle Upgrades Are Justified 0:00

- The question came from a member inside the community: when should I upgrade my lifestyle and how do you resist it?
- Never feel bad about upgrading your lifestyle when it's a genuine improvement
 - Going from sleeping on a mattress to buying a proper bed — totally fine
 - Replacing a barely-working, breaking phone or laptop — totally fine
 - Moving from an unsafe area to a safe area — necessary
 - Going from no car to a car that improves your daily life — that's just part of life, how it should be
- The framing: some upgrades are not optional luxuries, they are functional necessities
 - Example: if your laptop is broken, you cannot work — you have to upgrade, it's not a problem
 - If your income goes up by £2K/month, spending on better facilities that improve productivity or your business is legitimate

The "Thinking With Your Dick" Test 0:23

- The dividing line is motivation — are you buying for function or for ego?
- The test: be completely honest with yourself about why you are buying something
 - Example used: buying an Audi R8
 - It looks good, but it only has two seats and minimal boot space
 - Honest answer for many buyers: "to get my dick sucked and so everyone thinks I'm great"

- A study is referenced: if your child has no desire to be famous, no desire for viral social media attention or views, then you raised them correctly
 - The point: needing external validation is a character flaw to work on, not a goal to optimise for
- If you need luxury purchases so that everyone knows you're great, or to have hundreds of women looking at you, that signals inner work is needed

Why Supercars Are Actually a Negative 1:09

- Uses the McLaren 720S as a personal example — a car he likes — but breaks down why owning one as a primary vehicle would be pointless
 - Uncomfortable to drive
 - Can't take it far practically
 - Problem any time you have more than one passenger
 - Can't do the food shopping in it
 - If someone is ill, the last thing they want is to be in a supercar
 - Makes you and your family a target — kidnapping risk, general security concerns
 - If you have two kids and try to pick them up from school, you can only fit one
- Conclusion: "It's such a selfish decision that it says a lot about you. It's actually a negative thing."
- The only scenario where it makes sense: as a secondary weekend car — not a primary vehicle

? The Core Question to Ask Yourself 1:36

- Before any major lifestyle purchase, run it through this decision framework:
 - Am I planning for the long term?
 - Do I see a bigger, better future here?
 - Does this have a major positive effect on my life?
 - Or — am I just trying to be the guy who gets the most women in the next 12 months?
- This is described as a conscious decision you have to make for yourself

The Long-Term Cost of Status Spending 2:40

- If the goal is short-term status and attracting women through purchases, there is nothing inherently wrong with that choice — but the consequences are clear:
 - There is no longevity in it
 - "You will go broke pretty quickly"
 - The people attracted by those status symbols "do not care about you"
- The implicit takeaway: genuine lifestyle upgrades compound your life; ego-driven upgrades drain it