📋 Executive Summary

Entrepreneurs should make reversible (two-way door) decisions fast and irreversible (one-way door) decisions slowly and methodically, consulting experts and planning for every worst-case scenario before committing.

- ⚖️ How to Approach Each Type

🚪 Two-Way Door Decisions 0:00

- A two-way door decision is reversible — if things go wrong, you can simply turn around and walk back out
  - Example given: launching your products on Amazon
    - If the launch doesn't perform well, you can pull back without lasting consequences
- These decisions should be made at speed — "crazy fast" in the speaker's words
  - Because the cost of being wrong is low and recoverable, hesitation only slows growth

🔒 One-Way Door Decisions 0:10

- A one-way door decision is irreversible — once made, you cannot undo it
  - Example given: selling 20% of your company to specific partners
    - Once that equity is transferred, you cannot simply say "forget it, you're bad partners" and reclaim it
    - The partners, the terms, and the consequences are permanent
- These decisions carry high stakes precisely because the exit door is closed behind you

⚖️ How to Approach Each Type 0:22

- The core framework is matching your decision-making speed and rigor to the door type

Decision Type	Speed	Process
Two-way door (reversible)	Very fast	Minimal — just act and adjust

Decision Type	Speed	Process
One-way door (irreversible)	Slow & methodical	Consult experts, plan every catastrophic scenario

- For one-way doors specifically, the recommended steps are:
  - Take your time — do not rush under pressure
  - Consult experts who have navigated similar irreversible decisions
  - Plan meticulously for every catastrophic scenario that could occur
- The broader takeaway on entrepreneurial speed:
  - Yes, successful founders need to make decisions quickly overall
  - But that speed must be selective — applied to reversible choices, not irreversible ones

> The mark of a great entrepreneur isn't just making fast decisions — it's knowing which decisions deserve speed and which demand slow, deliberate care.
