

The VOID

Channel: Onem · Published: Jul 17, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/w1SVmKeU3oM> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

After finishing a major project, most people fall into "the void" — directionless emptiness post-celebration. The speaker's antidote is always having a 10-year plan so there's no confusion about what comes next.

Contents

- 🏆 Consistency Over Short-Term Outperformance
- 🎉 The Void: What It Is and How It Hits
- ⚠️ Why the Void Is Dangerous
- 🗺️ The 10-Year Plan as an Antidote
- 📅 Structured Recovery Before Getting Back to It

Consistency Over Short-Term Outperformance 0:00

- Core belief: anyone can outwork or out-train him for a day or even a week
 - "Every single one of you can outwork me for a day, maybe a week"
 - He sees this happen in the gym — someone notices he's in good shape and starts training harder than him
 - His response: "I'll let you have this one. I'll let you win. But I probably won't see you tomorrow."
- The edge is not intensity on any given day — it's showing up again and again over a long stretch of time
 - "I always get outworked by somebody on one day or one week, but never over a long stretch of time. Never."

The Void: What It Is and How It Hits 1:06

- Definition: the void is the empty, directionless feeling that arrives between projects — specifically right after completing something massive
- He just finished a large project and felt genuinely exhausted
 - Took his girlfriend out for a meal, had a glass of wine, had an ice cream earlier in the day
 - Was in bed by midnight, lay in bed longer than usual
 - Told himself: "Yeah, you've deserved this. Well done."
- Then the void hit — the celebration fades and a hollow "what now?" sets in
 - "You kind of sit there and you're like, 'What now? What am I doing now? What hits next?'"

⚠️ Why the Void Is Dangerous 1:29

- Analogy: people who work their whole lives toward retirement
 - Day 1 of retirement: celebrate, have wine, stay up late watching a movie, have sex with the missus
 - Day 2: do the same
 - Day 3: "you want to shoot yourself in the dick" — the lack of purpose becomes unbearable
- Fighters experience the same thing between bouts
 - They get lost without a fight or training camp to anchor them
 - "They're like, 'I'd rather be fighting. I'd rather be training.'"
- The common thread: humans need a clear "next thing" to work toward or the void corrodes motivation and wellbeing

🗺️ The 10-Year Plan as an Antidote 1:52

- His solution: always have plans 10 years in advance
 - "Many thinking decades are dangerous" — but he frames long-range planning as a protective tool
 - When a project finishes, he already knows where it lands on the broader path
 - "That has made a dent in it. That's fantastic."
- Finishing one thing simply unlocks the next area — he uses a GTA (Grand Theft Auto) analogy
 - Like completing a mission that opens up a new zone on the map
 - There is no void because the map already exists; you just move to the next unlocked section
- Knowing what to return to eliminates the aimless drift that causes the void

July 17

Structured Recovery Before Getting Back to It 2:16

- He doesn't deny himself rest — he deliberately schedules a short, guilt-free recovery window
 - One meeting today, then the rest of the day: admin tasks, sunbathing, gym, sauna to sweat out the red wine, general chill
 - Saturday: spend time with his girlfriend
 - Sunday: watch the World Cup final (a big game he's looking forward to)
 - Chores around the house as needed
- Monday: back at it "like an absolute lunatic" — and crucially, he already knows exactly what to work on
- The key distinction is the combination of two things:
 - Knowing when to rest vs. when to work
 - Knowing what to get back to immediately — removing any ambiguity that breeds the void
- "I think my consistency just beats everybody every time."
 - Short bursts of effort from others don't compound; his relentless return to the plan does