-  Habit 1: Plan Every Hour in Your Calendar
-  Habit 2: Get Out of Bed Immediately When the Alarm Goes Off
-  Habit 3: Choose One Topic Every Month and Study It Daily
-  Habit 4: Train in a Way That Actually Challenges You

Habit 1: Plan Every Hour in Your Calendar 0:00

- Schedule every hour of every day using a calendar
 - Carter has practiced this consistently for 15 years
 - He calls it "the number one thing" he attributes his success to
- The underlying principle: intentional time design prevents drifting and keeps focus on what matters

Habit 2: Get Out of Bed Immediately When the Alarm Goes Off 0:00

- Rise the moment the alarm sounds — no snoozing, no delay
- The reasoning: hitting snooze means starting the day by negotiating with yourself and making compromises
 - If the first decision of the day is a compromise, that pattern tends to carry into everything else

"Don't start your day off negotiating with yourself and making compromises."

Habit 3: Choose One Topic Every Month and Study It Daily 0:23

- Pick a single topic each month that can genuinely improve your life, then learn about it every day
- Examples of qualifying topics mentioned:
 - Sales
 - Nutrition

- AI
- Making content
- Money
- The key constraint is focus — one topic per month rather than scattered, shallow consumption

Habit 4: Train in a Way That Actually Challenges You 0:23

- Workouts must go beyond simply making you tired
- The goal is to become stronger, fitter, and more capable — both physically and mentally
- The distinction: fatigue alone is not progress; genuine challenge drives adaptation and builds mental resilience alongside physical gains
- Closing point: these four habits collectively separate people who act on success from "the people who just talk about success"
