

Do you do BJJ?

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Sep 06, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/bkperqfXIMI> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

A quick, humorous Shorts conversation about BJJ's cultural explosion post-Joe Rogan, segueing into a real talk about physical fitness and readiness as motivators for fatherhood.

Contents

-  BJJ's Popularity Surge Among White Men
-  Being Big as a Natural Deterrent
-  Fatherhood as the Real Motivation

BJJ's Popularity Surge Among White Men 0:00

- One speaker announces he's planning to start jiu-jitsu
- The other immediately clocks the trend
 - Over the last five years, seemingly every white guy he knows has taken up BJJ
 - His analogy: "It's almost like basketball for white guys"
 - Credits Joe Rogan as the catalyst — "Ever since Joe Rogan told y'all to start doing it, y'all got your orders"
- The first speaker clarifies his personal reason
 - He acknowledges he's not trying to become a "big guy"
 - He wants a practical skill set regardless of size

Being Big as a Natural Deterrent 0:20

- The conversation pivots to what it means to be someone your son admires
 - Point made that an 8-year-old son already sees his dad as "dope" if the dad is fit, successful, and level-headed
- The "cheat code" offered: simply being muscular removes you as a target
 - "Predators look for prey" — guys looking to start fights won't pick the visibly muscular man
 - The logic: size alone is a passive but powerful deterrent, no martial arts required

Fatherhood as the Real Motivation 0:42

- The first speaker reveals the deeper driver: he has a six-year-old daughter
 - This changes the calculus — being big and unthreatening isn't enough
 - "I do got to fight somebody. I got to be ready."
- The implication: having a daughter means a father may genuinely need to be physically capable of protecting her, not just intimidating as a deterrent
 - The other speaker immediately agrees, validating this as a distinct and legitimate reason to train