

Celebrate Jealousy

Channel: Onem · Published: Sep 25, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/_GBOPE0ZmKM Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

When people scowl, put you down, or act jealous, it's a signal you're doing well and look like a threat. Negativity from others is a mirror of your progress — celebrate it.

Contents

-  The Setup: Hill Sprints and Getting in Shape
-  Two Old Guys Screw-Facing Him on the Street
-  The Friend Who Slagged Him Off When He Looked Good
-  The Man City Analogy: Hate Follows Success
-  The Core Life Lesson: Negativity Means Results

The Setup: Hill Sprints and Getting in Shape 0:00

- He's visibly out of breath because he's been doing hill sprints and runs
 - He's "practicing what he preaches" — currently training every day and getting up early
 - Fat that accumulated as he got older is "slowly dropping away" while he's retaining muscle
 - He notes it's "really paying off"
- He's working on an upcoming video called "How to Be Big, Athletic, and Aesthetic"
 - This short is essentially a teaser/mindset supplement to that content

Two Old Guys Screw-Facing Him on the Street 0:23

- While out training, he walked past two older men who gave him a proper scowl
- Rather than feeling bothered, he laughed and celebrated the moment
 - His interpretation: a scowl or negative reaction from a stranger means you look good
 - "That's what it means."

The Friend Who Slagged Him Off When He Looked Good 0:23

- He had a friend when he was younger whose compliments were actually a bad sign
 - When the friend said things like "You look good tonight mate, you look amazing, you should get more of those t-shirts" — those were the nights he got no women

- When the friend insulted him — "Fucking hell, what happened to your hair?" / "You're looking a bit fat mate" / "That t-shirt looks bad on you" / "You look super gay wearing that" — those were the nights he ended up doing well with women
- He eventually recognised the pattern: the friend would slag him off precisely when he looked good
 - When you're not a threat, people build you up
 - When you are a threat, people try to tear you down

"When you're not a threat, everyone loves you."

The Man City Analogy: Hate Follows Success 1:09

- He's a Manchester City supporter and uses the club's trajectory as a parallel
 - When City were in Division Two, everyone used to say "Oh, they're my second favourite team"
 - Now that they're the best team, everybody hates them and makes excuses
 - Common excuse from critics: "Oh, they've got money" (implying results don't count)
 - He counters: he remembers City drawing 32,000 fans every week even when they were the worst team in the country — the support was always real, the hate is new and reactive
- The takeaway: "Everyone just lies based on how it makes them feel"
 - People's opinions of you are shaped by how threatening you are to them, not by objective reality

The Core Life Lesson: Negativity Means Results 1:32

- If someone is laughing at you, putting you down, or being jealous — smile
 - It means you're getting results
 - "Otherwise, if you were some fat blob, everyone would want to be friends with you"
- The formula he lays out:
 - More people hating on you → more likely you're doing well
 - More frowny faces → stronger signal of progress
 - Universal approval and zero criticism → you're probably not a threat to anyone
- Final line: "The people that hate you, the more people that go against you, the more people that give you a frowny face — you're probably doing pretty well."