The Case for Pre-Workout Before Sex 0:00

- Carter opens with a comedic cultural framing: if you're having interracial sex, you're "representing your whole race" — so why wouldn't you prepare?
- His core claim: skipping pre-workout before sex means you "basically a virgin" because you haven't truly experienced sex at full performance capacity
- Key ingredient called out: caffeine
 - Caffeine's cited benefit: "improves performance"
 - This is the primary rationale for the pre-workout recommendation

Vasodilators and Blood Flow 0:23

- Many pre-workouts contain vasodilators, which increase blood flow and produce a muscular "pump" during workouts
- Carter connects this directly to sexual function: "What you think an erection is? It's just blood flow."
 - The joke/logic: the same mechanism that gives you a gym pump theoretically supports an erection
 - This is presented humorously, not as medical advice

The Double Scoop Punchline 0:23

- Carter lands the comedic climax of the short: if the sex is interracial, double scoop the pre-workout
 - Reasoning: "you representing us all, brother"
 - Delivered to audible laughter, signaling the intentionally absurdist, jokey tone of the entire clip

- The overall bit is a comedy short playing on gym-culture language applied to sex — not a serious supplement guide
