

October 4, 2026

Channel: Tim Luong · Published: Oct 05, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/80XVs4J5DhE> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Tim Luong presents a simple three-part framework — What, How, When — for building clarity and setting clear expectations with team members at any experience level.

Contents

-  The Core Problem: Creating Clarity
-  What — Defining Success
-  How — Explaining the Process
-  When — Setting Deadlines

The Core Problem: Creating Clarity 0:00

- The central question: how do you create clarity within your team?
 - The answer is to set clear expectations with the people on your team
 - The recommended framework for thinking about this is: What, How, When

What — Defining Success 0:00

- Does each person know what success looks like in their role?
 - This is the starting point — without a shared definition of success, nothing else matters
 - Success should be concrete and measurable, e.g. clear KPIs and specific numbers they need to hit

How — Explaining the Process 0:20

- Once they know what success is, do they know how to achieve it?
 - The level of guidance needed depends on seniority:
 - Senior hires can typically figure out the "how" on their own
 - Junior hires may need step-by-step instruction on exactly how to do the work
 - Example from Tim's own team: Virtual Assistants (VAs) are given clear SOPs (Standard Operating Procedures) that detail exactly how each task should be performed

When — Setting Deadlines 0:20

- The final dimension: do team members know when expectations must be met?
 - This includes both one-off deadlines and recurring responsibilities
 - Key question: are deadlines and timeframes made explicitly clear?
 - Ambiguity around timing is a common source of dropped expectations