

The game never ends.

Channel: Tim Luong · Published: Sep 05, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/8-mcrKg6DU4> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Money-making is an infinite, never-ending game where someone will always outperform you. The solution is to define "enough" using the regret minimization framework — asking what your 80-year-old self would regret.

Contents

- 💰 Money Is an Infinite Game
- 🚀 The Regret Minimization Framework

💰 Money Is an Infinite Game 0:00

- The pursuit of money has no finish line
 - "I'm going to make money tomorrow and 10 years from now I'm still going to make money"
 - There will always be someone out there better than you at making money
- Because the game is infinite, you can never truly "win" it
- This reality forces a personal decision: define what "enough" means to you
 - Without that definition, you risk sacrificing your social life and health just to accumulate more

🚀 The Regret Minimization Framework 0:22

- Tim's personal framework for deciding when enough is enough
- The core question: If I look back at my life at 80 years old, would I have regretted not doing this one thing?
 - If the answer is yes — do it, even if it costs money or opportunity
 - If the answer is no — it may not be worth the sacrifice

The game never ends, so the only winning move is deciding what the game means to you personally before it consumes everything else.