📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter makes a brief, lighthearted argument that "almond milk" is a misnomer — it should be called "almond juice" — because true milk must come from a mammal's breast.

- His girlfriend drinks almond milk — he acknowledges that and says it's fine for her.
- His personal stance: the product should be called almond juice, not almond milk.
  - Reasoning: milk, by definition, must come from a mother's breast (i.e., a mammary gland).
  - He presents this as straightforward and self-evident — "that's a known fact."
- No further nutritional, brand, or product details are discussed; the clip is a single short opinion statement.
