Even the GOATs Need a Coach. Why Don't You?

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Oct 21, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/dSP86E7fu8w Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

The greatest athletes in history — Jordan, LeBron, Brady — all rely on coaches and accountability structures. If the best in the world need them, ordinary people have no excuse to go it alone.

📑 Contents

- 🏆 The GOAT Argument: Elite Athletes All Have Coaches
- 🤝 Practical Takeaway: Get a Coach or an Accountability Partner

🏆 The GOAT Argument: Elite Athletes All Have Coaches 0:00

- Michael Jordan — described as unquestionably the greatest basketball player of all time — had coaches throughout his career
- LeBron James — acknowledged as having proven himself exceptionally — also has coaches
  - Specifically noted to have both a head coach and a strength & conditioning coach
- Tom Brady had a fitness coach AND a nutrition coach during the years he was winning championships
- Core argument: these are the best athletes in history at what they do, yet they still rely on coaches

> If the greatest performers in the world need coaching, assuming you can succeed without it is an inconsistent and unfounded belief.

- The implicit logic: if expertise alone were enough, the GOATs would have dropped their coaches — they didn't

🤝 Practical Takeaway: Get a Coach or an Accountability Partner 0:21

- Primary recommendation: find yourself a coach
- If a coach is financially out of reach, the fallback is an accountability partner — a friend who fills that role
  - Step 1 — Choose one friend specifically for this purpose
  - Step 2 — Tell them your goals clearly
  - Step 3 — Define the KPIs (key performance indicators) you will track
  - Step 4 — Hold each other accountable every single day — both in the morning and in the evening
- The twice-daily check-in (morning + evening) is emphasized as the operating rhythm for this partnership