

How are you supposed to pick a career at 18?

Channel: Tim Luong · Published: Jun 22, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/ufxRJ4uVTM4> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Choosing a career at 18 is nearly impossible because most people don't yet know their real strengths. Trying five or more different things early on is the recommended path to genuine self-discovery.

Contents

-  The Problem with Picking a Career at 18
-  The Solution: Try Multiple Things

The Problem with Picking a Career at 18 0:22

- At 18, most people have no clear sense of their strengths, skills, or direction
 - One speaker reflects: "I had no clue what my strengths were, what I was good at, what I wanted to do."
- The education system forces a major life decision at a point when self-knowledge is at its lowest
 - Both speakers agree this is "pretty crazy"
- What school teaches you about yourself may be inaccurate
 - Whatever you've been told you're good at in high school may not reflect your actual abilities
 - This creates a distorted self-image that leads people into the wrong paths

The Solution: Try Multiple Things 0:0

- The core advice: try at least five different things to discover what you genuinely like and what you're actually good at
- Wasted years early in life are largely attributed to not knowing your real strengths
 - Acting on false or school-imposed beliefs about your abilities is identified as a primary cause of this waste
- Experimentation is framed as the only reliable path to authentic self-knowledge at a young age