

It's not about how crazy the meal is, it's what it can do for you.

Channel: Greg Lav · Published: Sep 21, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/EUWS61Gb8S4> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Greg Lav swears by a dead-simple daily diet anchor — rice and chicken thighs — arguing that nailing a consistent macro foundation beats any complicated nutrition plan.

Contents

-  The Daily Routine: Rice & Chicken as a Foundation
-  The Philosophy: Simplicity Wins

The Daily Routine: Rice & Chicken as a Foundation 0:00

- He arrives first in the office every day and immediately starts the rice cooker
 - This is his very first action upon arriving — it sets the tone for the day
- Every night he receives approximately 2 lb of chicken thighs, which he brings to work the next day for lunch
 - The delivery system is pre-arranged and automatic, removing any daily decision-making
- The point is NOT that rice and chicken is all he eats
 - It serves as the macro foundation — once that base is covered, he can eat whatever else he wants
 - The base meal locks in protein and carbohydrate targets, giving flexibility for the remainder of the day

The Philosophy: Simplicity Wins 0:23

- His core belief: simplicity wins with diet
- He used to overcomplicate his nutrition — and it didn't work
- Stripping everything back to a repeatable, boring anchor meal is what finally produced consistent results

"I used to overcomplicate the out of it and this is what has worked."

- The takeaway is transferable: find a simple macro anchor you can repeat daily, then build flexibility around it rather than trying to engineer every meal from scratch