📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter skips cooking entirely because his hourly rate as an entrepreneur makes food prep a poor use of time — he outsources meals to meal prep services and Uber Eats instead.

💰 The Hourly Rate Reasoning 0:00

- Tracks exactly how much money he makes per hour
  - Knowing his hourly rate makes it clear when an activity is a poor trade of time for money
  - Cooking falls into that category — time spent preparing food is time not spent earning

🍱 What He Does Instead 0:00

- Uses two primary alternatives to home cooking:
  - Orders from a meal prep company — food arrives pre-made and only needs to be heated up
  - Orders via Uber Eats or goes out to eat every night
- Has not cooked a meal in almost a decade

⚠️ Who This Advice Does NOT Apply To 0:23

- This strategy only works because he is an entrepreneur who can work around the clock
  - The freed-up time is immediately filled with more income-generating work
- If you have a 9-to-5 job, he explicitly says this is "probably not right for you"
  - Reason: you likely wouldn't be working during the time you'd otherwise spend cooking anyway, so there is no meaningful financial trade-off being made
