📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter owns no car and uses Uber exclusively, arguing the mental load of car ownership — not the cost — is what he wants to eliminate from his life.

🚫 Why He Doesn't Own a Car 0:00

- The core reason is mental overhead, not finances
  - He explicitly says "the money is not the problem"
  - The burden is the constant remembering and managing of car-related tasks
- Tasks he wants to eliminate from his thinking:
  - Oil changes
  - Washing the car
  - Security concerns
  - Paying bills (he acknowledges autopay exists, but still doesn't want it on his mind)
- He also rejects the "just hire a chauffeur" suggestion he frequently hears
  - His reasoning: a personal chauffeur is "another employee" and "way more to think about"
  - The whole point is reducing things to manage, not adding them

📱 Uber as the Solution 0:21

- He uses Uber "almost everywhere" he goes
- Frames it as the functional equivalent of a chauffeur — without the management burden
  - "Anytime I want to leave, it's like having a chauffeur. I just hit a button. Somebody comes pick me up, take me wherever I want to."
- The appeal is pure on-demand simplicity: one button press, zero ongoing responsibility
