

Get A Job Before Starting A Business

Channel: Onem · Published: Jul 01, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/Gk4TDcQ-Ryw> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

A blunt, personal rebuttal of social media's "quit your job, start a business" advice — arguing that broke young people have no choice but to work a 9-5, save aggressively, and build capital before attempting entrepreneurship.

The Rich Kid Epidemic on Social Media 0:00

- The central warning: social media is flooded with wealthy people giving advice that only applies to people who already have money
 - These creators tell their audiences: "Quit your job, start a business, become an entrepreneur, making money is easy"
 - The problem is that this advice is delivered by people who started with significant inherited or family wealth
- The speaker references a previous well-received video on the topic — "everybody should get a 9-5 job" — as context for this continuation
 - Core belief: 9-5 jobs are genuinely good for you
 - Benefits cited: career opportunities, meeting and learning from millionaires at a young age

Personal Background: Working From Nothing 0:24

- Speaker's personal circumstances growing up:
 - Mother held five jobs simultaneously
 - No money in the household
 - Father was not present — was with another woman at the time
- How he responded to those circumstances:
 - Worked on building sites during the day and mornings for cash

- Worked at Pizza Planet in the evenings and at night
- Focus was purely on saving whatever he could earn

The Walking-to-Work Story and the "Value Your Time" Fallacy 0:46

- Anecdote involving the son of a former boss — the boss was worth £100 million, the son grew up wealthy but was described as "a lovely guy"
- The speaker mentioned he walked to work and back every day to save money
 - The rich kid pulled out a calculator and worked out that the speaker was valuing his own time at roughly £4.50 per hour
 - Implied this was irrational or beneath him
- The speaker's rebuttal — the "value your time" argument is context-dependent:
 - If you are already making £3,000 per hour, walking 3 hours instead of paying for transport is a genuine loss
 - But when you are broke and have nothing, that framing is completely irrelevant
- Key distinction the speaker says "never gets explained" by online gurus:
 - When you have no money, you do not get to philosophise about hourly value — you just need cash
 - Walking 1.5 hours each way (3 hours total, there and back) to save the fare is entirely rational
 - The counter-argument — "you're losing time and getting tired" — is dismissed: "I don't have enough money to pay my bills"

The Real Advice for Broke People 1:31

- When you are broke, the only viable strategy is extreme frugality:
 - Save every single penny
 - "Live like a bum"
 - Eat chicken and rice on repeat
 - Buy mass gainer and porridge — cheap, calorie-dense food that "just keeps you alive"
- You cannot afford to worry about abstract concepts like time value or hourly rate at this stage
- The goal is to accumulate enough capital to have a starting point — the foundation that wealthy people already have by default

"Get a 9-to-5 job, stop being an idiot, and save up some money so you can get a beginning."

Called-Out Gurus: Luke Belmar and Ghazi 2:16

- Luke Belmar specifically named as an example of the rich kid epidemic:
 - Speaker claims Belmar's father runs a Christian school and his grandfather has a net worth of approximately $100 million

- Implication: Belmar's "rags to riches" narrative is misleading given this background
- Ghazi also mentioned:
 - People who went to school with him reportedly say he arrived in a Rolls-Royce
 - Ghazi claims to have grown up broke in Chelsea (London)
 - Speaker's retort: *"You can't grow up broke in Chelsea — that's an oxymoron, it doesn't exist"
- Broader takeaway from these examples:
 - Audiences are receiving business and entrepreneurship advice from people who started with significant capital
 - For someone starting from zero, it could take 5 to 10 years just to reach the financial starting point these gurus already had
 - Therefore, getting a 9-5 job and saving is not a setback — it is the necessary first phase
