I'm 44 and Still Outworking Everyone

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Nov 01, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/zQP1zvq4534 Source: description only

📋 Executive Summary

At 44, Brandon Carter trains and works daily with the intensity of someone with something to prove, arguing that relentless work ethic — not talent — is what sustains long-term success.

📑 Contents

- 🏋️ Daily Training Discipline
- 💼 Work Ethic as a Business Philosophy
- 🏆 Talent vs. Work: The Core Argument

🏋️ Daily Training Discipline

- Trains consistently at age 44, framing it as still having "something to prove"
- Morning routine starts before the alarm goes off
  - Bag work (boxing/striking training)
  - Handstands (bodyweight skill work)
  - Bench press (strength training)
  - Rope (jump rope or battle ropes for conditioning)
- The variety of the routine signals a commitment to well-rounded physical development, not just aesthetics

💼 Work Ethic as a Business Philosophy

- Immediately after physical training, the focus shifts to business: "the laptop opens and the business gets built"
- The cycle repeats the next day without exception — consistency is the core mechanism
- The implication is that there is no off-season; both body and business are treated as ongoing projects

🏆 Talent vs. Work: The Core Argument

- "Talent gets you noticed. Work is what keeps you there."
  - Talent is framed as an entry point, not a guarantee of sustained success
  - Longevity and relevance come from sustained effort, not innate ability

> "You don't have to be the most gifted guy in the room. You just have to be the one nobody can outwork."

- The key competitive advantage he identifies is being the hardest worker, not the most naturally skilled
- This is positioned as accessible — it requires no special gifts, only commitment