

If You Want to Live a Life with No Regrets, Start Here

Channel: Greg Lav · Published: Sep 16, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=wrWI294c5VM> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

Greg Levia, CEO and co-founder of Bloom, shares the mindset and lessons behind building a half-billion-dollar energy drink brand in 7 years — arguing that regret costs more than any risk, and that a life of pursuit is always worth it.

Contents

-  Introduction: Who Greg Is and Why This Channel Exists
-  The Bloom Origin Story: From Nobody to Half a Billion
-  Lesson 1: Stick to the Plan, Not Your Mood
-  Lesson 2: Being Anonymous Is Your Superpower
-  Lesson 3: Block Out Opinions From People Who Haven't Done the Thing
-  Lesson 4: Love Building — Not Winning or Hating Losing
-  Lesson 5: You Are a Firefighter — Accept It
-  The Finish Line Always Moves — and That's the Point
-  Closing Call to Action

Introduction: Who Greg Is and Why This Channel Exists 0:00

- The video opens with a core premise: ambition is the most powerful tool in society
 - The fuel Greg uses is the mental image of being 80 years old and looking back at the life he could have had
 - The investment required to pursue a moonshot is large — but regret costs more than any of it
 - "That is the most expensive thing on this planet. It is regret."
- Greg states his mission for the channel: pass down lessons from his 10-year journey so viewers can skip ahead
 - He wants viewers to be further ahead in 10 years than he is right now
 - The channel is explicitly for people with ambition who are trying to figure out direction

The Bloom Origin Story: From Nobody to Half a Billion 0:23

- Greg Levia is CEO and co-founder of Bloom, a supplement and energy drink brand
- Timeline of Bloom's growth:

- 2019 — Greg and his wife co-founded Bloom (7 years ago from the video's publish date)
- ~2024 — Bloom's energy drink launched (2 years before recording)
- 2026 — The brand is on track to do over half a billion dollars in sales and sell over half a billion cans within just 2 years of the drink's launch
- Context of what this means competitively:
 - Bloom is now "truly in the conversations of Monster and Red Bull"
 - Greg describes going from CEO of a supplement company to CEO of a top-tier energy drink brand in 2 years
- Personal background at the start:
 - Greg barely graduated college with a 2.4 GPA
 - His wife had dropped out of college once or twice
 - Neither had money or recognized value in society
- Core takeaway from the origin story:
 - "A cosmic shift in your life trajectory can happen if you just commit to something for 2 years straight."
 - "Stop signing up for this fast money shit and sign up for a real generational run."
 - A generational run, in Greg's case, has taken 7 years

Lesson 1: Stick to the Plan, Not Your Mood 2:41

- The first step of pursuing a moonshot is defining what you want — most people can't even articulate their goals
- Framework: write two lists
 - List 1 — Who/what you do NOT want to be
 - Greg's personal examples: a bad dad, a bad husband, out of shape, broke, the "status quo American male" making $70k/year who is overweight, divorced, and drinks every night
 - Being passionate about who you don't want to be makes it easy to define who you do want to be
 - List 2 — Who you DO want to be and what your actual goals are
- Practical application — remove emotional decision-making by pre-planning:
 - Greg plans all his morning workouts every Sunday for the week ahead
 - Without a pre-set plan, waking up on Thursday with no structure leads to skipping the workout
 - With a written plan, there's nothing to decide — you just follow it
- The danger of emotional decisions in business:
 - Earlier in his career, Greg made decisions to "heal the chip on his shoulder" — trying to prove wrong people from high school, teachers, parents
 - He would toxically compete with random Amazon brands that no longer exist, making short-term decisions instead of long-term strategic ones
 - Concrete example: seeing a competitor put a big Black Friday discount on their product and impulsively matching it

- "Fuck discounting your product just to beat them. That's not actually what's best for the long-term goals of your business."
- The rule: every decision you make must align with your defined end goal — not your current emotion or mood

Lesson 2: Being Anonymous Is Your Superpower 5:46

- Being unknown — a "nobody" — is reframed as bulletproof armor, not a disadvantage
- Why anonymity is a superpower:
 - You can take five losses in a row and no one notices or cares
 - If Greg makes a mistake with Bloom now, it damages his public reputation — he doesn't have that freedom anymore
 - There are billions of people on Earth; no one from your hometown crowd actually matters at scale
- Greg says he is genuinely envious of people at the starting position because:
 - You can do anything
 - You have nothing to lose
 - Having nothing to lose is itself the greatest superpower
- Legacy brands are vulnerable:
 - Greg calls out that large legacy brands (toilet paper, hydration drinks, deodorants, etc.) are "getting caught with their pants down"
 - Opportunity exists to walk into Target and Walmart aisles and go after these incumbent brands
- Encouragement: "Enter the arena swinging with everything you have because you truly have nothing to lose."

Lesson 3: Block Out Opinions From People Who Haven't Done the Thing 7:41

- Greg has a binary rule on whose opinions he listens to:
 - If they have not done the specific thing you are trying to do → their opinion is worthless, full stop
- The fastest way to kill your dreams: ask others for their opinion
 - Most people don't even have access to someone who has actually done the thing
- Who this disqualifies (and why it's uncomfortable):
 - Parents — they mean well, but haven't participated in the 2026 arena
 - University professors — same issue
 - Friends and peers you respect — you can respect them without giving them access to your trajectory
- Why 2026 is categorically different from any previous era:
 - Technology is democratized — everyone has access to the same arena
 - 20-year-olds are becoming millionaires overnight via TikTok Shop

- 25-year-olds are building brands with real enterprise value
- 31-year-olds are doing what used to take 60 years, in under 10 years
- "This would have never happened in 2014. This would have never happened in the 1990s. It can only happen in 2026."
- Conclusion: nobody who has not participated in the current arena has any right to advise you on it — so don't let them

Lesson 4: Love Building — Not Winning or Hating Losing 8:53

- An entrepreneur asked Greg: "Do you love winning or do you hate losing?"
 - Greg's answer: neither — "I just love building."
- Why building is the right obsession:
 - Building turns you into the best version of yourself
 - Decades of building produce fulfillment and a life you're proud of
 - Winning and losing are emotional, short-term fixations that cause fear-based decisions
- The problem with win/loss obsession:
 - Obsessed with winning → constant fear of not winning
 - Obsessed with hating losing → constant fear of losing
 - Fear causes emotional decisions, which derail long-term goals
- A true winner loses more than they win — because they take so many swings
 - Losses stack up, but wins compound over time and far exceed any single loss
 - "Every day the scoreboard starts at zero."
- Greg's real losses (used to illustrate this):
 - Kicked out of some of the largest retailers
 - Been in eight figures of debt during his career
 - Hours away from massive layoffs at Bloom
 - Two months before recording: overproduced root beer soda → wrote a check for $10 million because inventory was going to expire
 - His reaction: not fear, not paralysis — he moved forward
 - One month later: launched "Pear Scare," a new top-performing energy drink whose success far exceeded the $10M loss
- Mindset reframe on the word "hard":
 - Society calls getting a six-pack hard, building a $100M business hard
 - Greg's counter: it's harder to be fat than to have a six-pack; harder to be broke than to build a $100M business; harder to be 80 and full of regret than to just go after it
 - "Hard is whatever you decide it to be. No matter what choice you make, it's going to be hard. So you might as well choose the life of pursuit."

- What Greg asks of the universe: not to remove all losses — only that the experience turns him into the best possible version of himself

Lesson 5: You Are a Firefighter — Accept It 15:28

- Greg dismantles the "must be nice" narrative (recording from his Aspen home backyard on a Wednesday)
 - Real story: after 5 years of missing Christmases due to work, they finally attended one — and that same day, four 18-wheelers full of Bloom greens product were stolen by the Mexican cartel
 - He had to leave Christmas brunch immediately to address the crisis
- The key mindset shift: you are a firefighter
 - Problems do not stop — ever
 - There is no phase of the life of pursuit where everything is solved and you coast
 - Every single day is problem-solving
 - Greg has "learned to love the heat" — he lets his eyebrows metaphorically burn off because he is that close to the fire
- Practical implication: sometimes you need to let fires burn a little — not every problem requires immediate total intervention
- What you are actually signing up for:
 - Not a finish line — a new life path
 - Even the wealthiest people in the world (worth $100B+) are not retired on a beach — they are still building
 - This is a sport of endurance, not a sprint
- The alternative — a cautious, boring life — is compared to "leaving a ship in the harbor"
 - "That is not what ships were built for. Ships were meant to go into the open sea and cross that shit."

The Finish Line Always Moves — and That's the Point 17:46

- Greg's observation after 10 years: what you currently dream of will likely be your average Tuesday in 1–2 years
 - But then the finish line moves forward again
 - This is a beautiful expectation to have, not a frustrating one
- You cannot even imagine your actual moonshot right now — and that's okay:
 - Greg's original moonshot: sell a million booty bands
 - Next moonshot: build the biggest greens powder in America
 - He never anticipated making an energy drink — now it's all he thinks about
 - "Who knows what I'll be thinking about in 10 years. And that excites me."
- How goals become stepping stones:
 - Each achieved goal becomes a "dot you connect" to the next one

- Starting point: anonymous, no liquidity, no net worth, no relationships, no power
- After pursuing goals: you accumulate cash, relationships with top retailers, knowledge of best manufacturers, a loyal team
- You never have to start from zero again — every new venture begins with the accumulated capital (financial, relational, reputational) of everything before it
- Greg's current asset base after 10 years:
 - Cash
 - Relationships with top retailers across America
 - Knowledge of the best manufacturers
 - A strong team he believes will follow him to whatever comes next

The road feeling lonely right now likely means you are going down the right path — chaos and uncertainty are the price of admission, not signs you're doing it wrong.

Closing Call to Action 20:28

- Greg reassures viewers: "I am here to make sure you know you are not alone."
- Reiterates that 99% of people around you cannot advise you because they have never participated in the current arena
- The only thing Greg had at the start — and the only thing viewers need — is ambition
 - "Take that ambition, point it in the right direction, and go after your moonshot."
- End goal framing: be 80 years old and look back with pride and fulfillment — not regret
 - "It is the greatest feeling in the world."
- Channel CTA: nearly 100k subscribers at time of recording; Greg invites viewers to subscribe and build this community together
 - "Let's make this road feel a little bit less lonely."
- Closes by restating his identity: Greg Levia, CEO and co-founder of Bloom