Finding Your Unfair Advantage 0:00

- The core question: how does someone identify the thing they're naturally good at — and stay conscious enough to lean into it?
- The method: look back at things you've accomplished in junior high, high school, or college that felt natural and easy
 - These aren't forced achievements — they're things you pursued on your own without being pushed
 - The feeling of effortlessness is the signal
- Example pattern used: leadership
 - If you're meant to be a leader, you were probably already gravitating toward those roles at a young age
 - Captain of a sports team
 - Class president
 - Club president or executive board member
 - These roles weren't assigned randomly — you went out of your way to pursue them
- The key insight: your natural inclinations at a younger age are predictive of where your unfair advantage lies later in life

The Two Halves of the Battle 0:48

- The process breaks down into exactly two equal parts:
 - 50% — Pattern recognition: actively looking back and identifying what you've naturally gravitated toward and succeeded at
 - 50% — Action and testing: once the patterns are spotted, acting on them and running experiments to validate them

- Neither half works alone — spotting the pattern without acting is wasted insight; acting without pattern awareness is directionless
