📋 Executive Summary

Greg Lav shares that Bloom's 2027 growth hinges on winning two opposite retail channels — convenience stores and club retailers like Costco and Sam's Club — arguing that rapid growth requires targeting everyone, not just one customer type.

🏪 The Two Big Growth Channels for Bloom in 2027 0:00

- Greg identifies the two biggest growth levers for Bloom heading into 2027
  - Channel 1: Convenience stores
  - Channel 2: Club retailers — specifically called out are Costco and Sam's Club
- His framing: "These are the places we have to win"

🎯 Two Opposite Customers, One Brand 0:00

- He acknowledges that what makes this goal daunting is that the two channels represent completely opposite customer profiles
- Convenience store customer:
  - Buying a single can from a cold refrigerator
  - Typically already knows what they want before walking into the store — a decisive, on-the-go purchase
- Club store customer:
  - Described as an affluent family mom buying for the whole household
  - Purchasing 18 to 24 cans at a time in a single bulk trip
- These are fundamentally different purchase occasions, basket sizes, and buyer mindsets

🚀 Why You Can't Pick Just One Target 0:23

- Greg's core argument: if you want to grow as fast as Bloom has — scaling significantly in roughly 3 years — you cannot afford to choose only one customer segment
- "You don't just get to pick one target — you have to pick fing [everyone]"
  - The transcript cuts off before the final word, but the implication is that Bloom's strategy is to serve the full spectrum of consumers simultaneously
- The brand's identity is built around operating across the entire market rather than niching down to a single buyer type
