Executive Summary

Mars Men, a natural testosterone supplement brand on Shopify, reached a $100M annual run rate profitably in under 18 months, raised $27.5M, and is scaling via sharp offer framing, forced subscriptions, 2,100+ Meta ads, and a precisely defined performance-driven male avatar.

Company Overview & Growth Metrics 0:23

- Mars Men is a DTC Shopify supplement brand focused on natural testosterone support
- Currently pulling 1.9 million monthly visitors, with traffic trending sharply up-and-to-the-right
 - Traffic is primarily US-based
- Hit a $100M annual run rate profitably in under 18 months
 - Served 400,000 customers before raising outside capital
- After proving profitability at scale, raised $27.5 million
 - Arie frames this as a likely future pattern in DTC: bootstrap to massive scale via Meta ads, retention, affiliates, and creators — then raise to tap VC networks
- Currently running 2,100 active ads simultaneously

The Offer Structure 1:55

- Core offer: 50% off for life, no code required

- "No code required" framing is highlighted as a smart direct-response touch — removes friction and feels more generous
- The offer is surfaced immediately in the first image above the fold: "Claim your free 50% off" → "Get 50% off" → "Get 50% off for life"
- Default subscription model — the site doesn't give you an option to buy once; you subscribe or you leave
 - This framing makes it feel like a system or therapy, not a one-time pill purchase
 - Subscription reinforces the "natural testosterone therapy" positioning
- Above-the-fold section contains everything needed to convert — offer, social proof, what to expect
- Free gifts are included to further sweeten the deal
- Customer journey timeline shown on the page:
 - Day 7 — "Ignition"
 - Day 30 — "Spark"
 - Day 90 — "Lift Off" (T production optimized fully)
- Ingredients are bundled (many that would be expensive to buy separately): Tongkat Ali, Shilajit, Taurine, Vitamin D, Boron, Zinc, Fenugreek — 8 total
 - Doses described as solid (especially Vitamin D), though not extreme
- Pricing: $59 refill (slight discrepancy vs. "50% off for life" claim, but apparently hasn't hurt conversions)
- 90-day money-back guarantee prominently featured

Market Size & Demand Trends 4:35

- Testosterone support market valued at over $8 billion per year (Arie believes real number is likely higher)
- Search demand breakdown:
 - "Testosterone supplements" — ~74,000 searches/month
 - "Testosterone therapy" — roughly 10x larger in search volume and trending sharply upward
- Mars Men deliberately uses the word "support" in branding, aligning with the "therapy" framing rather than "supplement" — captures a psychologically bigger and faster-growing demand category
- Root cause narrative driving demand: men feeling testosterone decline is not their fault — plastics leaching estrogen, seed oils, blue light disrupting hormones — positions the brand as fighting an external enemy
- Also noted: growing search interest in "testosterone therapy for women" as an adjacent trend

The Target Avatar 6:12

- Not just "men with low testosterone" — specifically the performance-driven man
- Profile:
 - Typically midlife or slightly older
 - Experiencing declining energy, sex drive, or mental sharpness
 - Actively seeking proven, natural solutions

- Goal: regain peak physical and mental performance, feel powerful and confident again
- Core desires (each individually targetable in ads):
 - Restore youthful energy and vitality
 - Enhance mental clarity and focus
 - Gain social confidence and presence
 - Achieve lasting health and well-being
 - Reignite sex drive and virility
 - Increase physical strength and muscle definition
- Arie's key insight: "When you realize your avatar, it kind of makes everything easier... and then you just keep spamming different formats."

Ad Strategy & Creative Breakdown 7:22

- 2,100 active ads running simultaneously — justified because every customer is on subscription (high LTV = can afford aggressive ad spend)
- Ads filtered by highest impressions reveal two main categories: offer ads and story/value ads

Top Offer Ad (Highest Impression Ad): - Simple creative leading with "50% off for life" - Ad copy breakdown:

- Hook: "Your grandfather had more testosterone at 60 than you do at 35." - Reason: plastics leaching estrogen, seed oils, blue light at 11pm - Reframe: "You're not weak, you're poisoned." - Mechanism: Tongkat Ali blocks enzyme stealing testosterone; Boron frees locked-up testosterone; Shilajit grows T-producing cells - Credibility: "No dirt powders, no cheap fillers, no fairy dust. Just 8 ingredients." - CTA: 50% off first month, 90-day guarantee, "Stop blaming yourself. Start fighting back."

Top Video Ad (Personal Story Format): - Hook: "You're not just getting old, your hormones crashed. Here's how I restored mine in 2 months." - Structure: - Calls out the two flawed alternatives: TRT (commits you forever, side effects) and placebo supplements (don't work) - Positions Mars Men as the third option — natural, clinically dosed, systematic - Creator is visibly the avatar: ~35 years old, shirtless at the gym, performance-driven man - Key copywriting move — disarming the skeptic: - Creator says his testosterone went from 217 to 564 in ~100 days, then immediately adds: "which I know isn't all that impressive, but it was all natty" - This pre-empts the "magic pill" objection; feels authentic rather than hype - TRT fear-based argument built into the script: - TRT causes your body to stop producing testosterone naturally — permanently - When you stop TRT, levels crash below where they started - Side effects: estrogen spikes, mood swings, fertility problems - Cost: $200–$500/month forever - Ends with: "Stay natty as long as possible. Skip the needles. Try Mars Men. 90-day risk-free return. What can you lose?" - Disclaimer included: "Bro, before you start TRT, you need to see your doctor."

Value/Education Ad (Cortisol Hook): - Headline: "You don't have eight separate problems, you have one. Eight signs of high cortisol in men." - Lists: puffy face, waking at 2–3am, tense neck, low energy, stubborn belly fat, sugar cravings, brain fog, low libido - Strategy: performance-driven men consume value content while scrolling; this pulls them in organically before the CTA - CTA: "Reclaim hormonal balance naturally. Try Mars Men for free."

The brand's ad playbook — blame external enemies (plastics, seed oils, blue light), define a precise avatar, run 2,100 variations hitting every core desire, and force subscription — is what's driving the $100M run rate.

Omnichannel Presence 13:32

- Meta is the primary revenue, awareness, and subscriber-building engine
- But Mars Men is also posting on X (Twitter) every single day, often multiple times per day
 - Individual post impressions: 700–2,600 per post
 - Arie estimates ~100,000 impressions/month on X for free
 - At 0.1% conversion, that's a meaningful subscriber base and potentially $1,000+/month in MRR from organic X alone
- Philosophy: "leaving no stone unturned" — no channel is neglected
- Note: Arie flags this level of omnipresence is for established brands, not beginners

Tools & Takeaways for Brands 14:40

- For beginners: Arie plugs his free Shopify store builder + a free product sourcing/shipping platform (no inventory required) as a zero-cost starting point
 - "You don't need to buy any courses. You don't need to invest in a $5,000 mentorship."
- For established brands troubleshooting growth: start by auditing your avatar
- Tool recommended: smartreply.io (free)
 - Found under the "Free Tools" tab on the site
 - Enter any Facebook page URL → it scrapes all comments → generates a customer avatar matrix
 - Includes core desires
 - Includes sub-avatars within the broader audience
 - Shows what real customers are saying (e.g., Mars Men comments reveal frustration with customer support)
 - Also functions as an automated customer support tool — Arie suggests Mars Men should use it for that given their comment complaints
- Broader strategic lesson: identify the avatar first → every ad format, angle, and channel decision flows naturally from there
- Arie's closing take on the testosterone supplement space: "still early, even though it's huge — I think it's only going to get bigger."
