Skipping breakfast does not prevent getting shredded. Total daily calorie and macro intake is what drives results, not meal timing — supported by Brandon's own 5-year intermittent fasting experience.

- Yes, you can absolutely get shredded without eating breakfast
  - Brandon states "Yeah, 100%" — it is a clear, unequivocal answer
- Personal experience: Brandon practiced intermittent fasting for approximately 5 years
  - He would not eat until 3:00 p.m. each day, skipping breakfast entirely
- The core principle: results come down to total calories consumed per day vs. calories burned
  - Meal timing is secondary; the overall daily energy balance is what matters
- To get shredded, the most important variables are:
  - Hitting the right number of total calories each day for your goal
  - Hitting the right macros (macronutrients) each day for your goal
- Key caveat: you need to actually know what your specific calorie and macro numbers are

- Brandon promotes a free tool he built called the Ripped Road Map
- What it does:
  - Takes your height, weight, and goal as inputs
  - Asks you to upload a photo of yourself
  - An AI scans the photo and estimates your exact body fat percentage
  - Reports how much total body fat you are currently holding
  - Outputs the exact daily calories and macros you need to reach your goal
- Cost: free

- How to get it: comment the word "road map" in the comments below the video
