

What Makes You Money Stops You Being Rich

Channel: Onem · Published: Jul 16, 2026 · Watch: <https://www.youtube.com/shorts/paxXUtuUrys> Source: full transcript

Executive Summary

The frantic energy that drives early business success eventually creates diminishing returns. At scale, organized prioritization and deliberate slowing down replace manic hustle as the engine of growth.

Contents

- 💡 Leila Hormozi's Core Insight
- 🌀 The Complexity Demanding the Shift
- 📝 Justin Jenk's Priority List Rule
- 🐢 Gary Vee's Slow-Down Quote

Leila Hormozi's Core Insight 0:00

- The speaker credits Leila Hormozi with advice he calls "some of the best I've ever heard"
 - Her argument: if you've been manic in your business journey for the first few years and it worked, that manic energy now needs to change
 - The very trait that got you to success — the craziness, the relentlessness — will have a counteractive, negative effect going forward
 - It got you "to the dance," but continuing it produces diminishing returns
- The reason for the shift: growth demands organization over raw intensity
 - Manic hustle is effective when the operation is small enough for one person to hold in their head
 - Once scale increases, the same behavior becomes chaotic rather than productive
- The speaker says he "deployed it in my own life" after watching the video

The Complexity Demanding the Shift 0:46

- He illustrates why the shift is necessary by listing everything running simultaneously at the time of filming:
 - Three people at his property/resort
 - Pool heater installation underway, with a specialist potentially flying in
 - Eight people on an ONM trip (location undisclosed, described as near North America), with a camera guy filming
 - Pending edits: a Bali vlog and a Tulum vlog
 - Just completed a ~500-video academy/guide — described deliberately as "not a course" but "a pathway" into ONM

- Created because many prospective members struggle with cash, life setup, and basic life skills
- Example: a trip attendee who had never flown before; a member who had never approached a woman
- At any given time managing 20–30 people: builders, cleaning team, pool staff
- Actively looking to hire a full-time on-site caretaker (to handle requests like coffee and food for guests)
- Exploring a second property in London
- His conclusion: with this many moving parts, manic energy is no longer helpful — it becomes noise

Justin Jenk's Priority List Rule 2:20

- The speaker learned a simple prioritization framework from Justin Jenk, described as someone worth over $100 million whom he used to work with
- The rule, in Jenk's own framing:
 - "You'll always have loads to do"
 - Sit down and make a list, top to bottom, ordered from highest to lowest priority
 - Start at the very top item — work on it, finish it, tick it off
 - Move to the next item — don't even think about what's below it
 - Repeat: "What's the top priority? Work on that. Tick. What's next? Tick."
- The power of the method is its simplicity and focus — eliminate everything from your attention except the single item at the top

Gary Vee's Slow-Down Quote 2:41

- The speaker connects Jenk's framework to a Gary Vaynerchuk principle he calls "one of Gary Vee's best quotes":

"The bigger the dream, the bigger the thing you're working on, the slower you go."

- His personal takeaway: now that his operation has reached genuine scale, slowing down is not laziness — it is the correct operating mode
 - The business has gotten "so big that you need to slow everything" (transcript ends mid-sentence)
- The throughline of the video: early-stage manic energy → scale → organized, deliberate, slow execution