Executive Summary

A 44-year-old online fitness coach in Miami walks through his structured weekday, emphasizing early rising, training as a priority, and remote work freedom as the payoff for not trading hours for a salary.

Contents

-  5:30 AM — Waking Up Before the City
-  7:00 AM — Training First
-  9:45 AM — Clients and Content from Home
-  11:00 AM — Rooftop, Sun, Skyline
-  Core Philosophy: Owning Your Time

5:30 AM — Waking Up Before the City

- Wakes at 5:30 AM with no external obligation forcing it — self-imposed discipline
 - Framed as a choice and a point of pride: "Nobody set that alarm but me"
- Rising before the city is presented as a competitive and psychological edge

7:00 AM — Training First

- Trains at 7:00 AM, before any client or business work begins
 - Described as treating the body like a "business card" — physical condition is part of his professional identity as a fitness coach
- Prioritizing training before work signals that fitness is non-negotiable, not an afterthought

9:45 AM — Clients and Content from Home

- Handles client work and content creation from a home office starting at 9:45 AM
 - As an online fitness coach, both his product (content) and his service (clients) are delivered digitally
- No commute, no physical office required

11:00 AM — Rooftop, Sun, Skyline

- By 11:00 AM he is on a rooftop in Miami — sun, skyline, open air

- Positioned as the reward and proof-of-concept for the lifestyle he has built
- "The work doesn't need me in an office, so I'm not in one" — location freedom as a deliberate outcome

Core Philosophy: Owning Your Time

- The throughline of the entire routine is autonomy over one's hours

"I didn't get more hours than you. I just stopped selling mine."

- The distinction he draws: most people trade their hours for a wage; he has built income streams (online coaching, content) that don't require clocking in
- Targeted at an audience of people over 40, implying it is never too late to restructure how you earn and spend your time
- Ends with an engagement prompt — "What time does your day actually start?" — inviting viewers to reflect on their own morning habits
