📋 Executive Summary

Greg Lav argues that today's 20-somethings are no longer spectators learning from the sidelines — the arena is open, the barrier to entry is gone, and young people are already qualified to compete at full speed.

🏟️ The Old Model Is Dead: Spectator vs. Player 0:00

- Greg claims he met hundreds of people in their 20s who have already built businesses worth over $100 million
  - This is presented as direct, firsthand evidence that the old timeline is obsolete
- In the previous generation, your 20s meant being a spectator — watching, learning, waiting your turn
- He uses the metaphor of an arena: "The arena door is wide open and the stands are full of the last generation"
  - The older generation occupies the stands (spectator seats), not the field
  - The implication: they are observers now, not the ones setting the rules for who gets to play

🚀 You Are Qualified to Play Right Now 0:23

- The older generation tells young people they're spectators "because that's how it used to work" — not because it's still true
- Greg's core claim: being in your 20s today means you have "full speed professional league activation" — you are ready to compete at the highest level immediately
- Takeaway framed as a right: "If you're in your 20s, you have every right to be a player"
  - The gatekeeping is a relic of a previous era, not a current reality
