Why I'm a Fair-Weather Fan

Channel: Brandon Carter · Published: Oct 19, 2026 · Watch: https://www.youtube.com/shorts/rzTFts09CMo Source: full transcript

📋 Executive Summary

Brandon Carter defends fair-weather fandom by arguing that because teams trade players and move cities without loyalty to fans, fans owe teams nothing in return — so he picks whoever is winning around week five.

📑 Contents

- 🌤️ The Fair-Weather Fan Philosophy

🌤️ The Fair-Weather Fan Philosophy 0:00

- Core argument: teams are not loyal to fans, so fans have no obligation to be loyal to teams
  - "The teams ain't loyal to us, so why do I need to be loyal to a team?"
- His approach: wait for the season to progress before choosing a team to root for
  - Waits until approximately week five to assess which team is performing well
  - Then declares that team his team for the season
- Two specific reasons teams forfeit fan loyalty:
  - Teams trade players — the players fans attach to can be gone at any moment
  - Teams move cities — the franchise itself can relocate, severing the geographic/community tie
- The transcript ends mid-sentence ("Okay, this is my..."), suggesting the full video is longer than the available clip